...we travel to Trancos and check in with former resident...Andrew Moravcsik [, who] writes, "When I graduated proudly in the first 50-50 male-female class, I thought gender equality—at least for those with a Stanford education—had been achieved. How naive that seems now. Our generation (and every one since) has found it difficult to fashion truly fair and equal two-career families and to balance work and care. Statistically, men still work a lot more and have more leisure time, whereas women do more childcare and housework. Women's careers are significantly stunted as a result. As an academic, I am a lucky exception: I have benefitted from flexible workplace rules that permitted me to pursue a successful career while being 'lead parent' of our two sons, thereby freeing up my wife, Anne-Marie Slaughter, to be professionally busier than I. Until more men are institutionally enabled, socially encouraged and culturally empowered to do likewise, we will not realize the promise of our historic beginnings as the first 50-50 class." Andrew has recently spoken about this topic in the Atlantic, New York Times, Washington Post, NPR's Marketplace, Good Morning America and other media outlets.

From "Class Notes - Class of 1979," Stanford Magazine (March/April 2016), p. 80.