Thank you to all who responded to our recent survey.

In response to the number of thoughtful comments and questions we received on the surveys, we have added a new "Frequently Asked Questions" section to our website.

In addition, a number of you inquired about receiving a print copy of the journal. While we no longer send out large numbers of complimentary copies due to cost, we do offer the opportunity to purchase subscriptions or single copies.

Below are some highlights of the survey:

- The majority of those who responded have known about us for more than three years, but almost half first learned about us in the last two years.
- While 20 percent of those who responded heard about us from a friend or colleague, and another 20 percent from a mailing, we were surprised to learn that the number one way people find us is through the internet.
- Ninety-five percent of those who responded rate us as "excellent" or "very good" on the accuracy of our work, 90 percent rate us as "excellent" or "very good" on the balance of our coverage, 74 percent rate us as "excellent" or "very good" on our accessibility for a large audience, and 91 percent rate us as "excellent" or "very good" on our comprehensiveness.
- Among the 80 percent of respondents who have read a journal or utilized a related product in the past year, the majority read one or more articles within a volume, a two-page executive summary, one or more article summaries, or a policy brief.
- Among those who responded, our readership is largely concentrated among college and university professors, researchers and students (27%); non-profit advocates (17%); and government employees (16%). Employees of other organizations (12%) and health care organizations (9%) make up the remainder.
- Three-quarters of respondents who have used our materials in the past year have relied on them to inform their own work — such as increasing general knowledge, educating others, writing a paper, or formulating policy.
- Fully eighty percent of respondents receive periodic notices from us via our Future of Children e-newsletter. To the other 20 percent, you're welcome to sign-up online!
