

Class Day History

Class Day provides an opportunity for seniors to stage their own graduation exercises. The Class Day ceremony is planned and presented by the members of the senior class. Although it varies from year to year, the event traditionally gives seniors an opportunity to acknowledge publicly achievements and contributions of members of the class and University community.

The program includes the awarding of various prizes to classmates, student speeches, a review of the class history, presentation of the key to campus by the president of the University and honorary class member inductions. Honorary class membership typically is granted to individuals whom the graduates feel have shaped their Princeton experience or touched their lives in some way. The Class Day ceremony ends with the singing of Princeton's alma mater, "Old Nassau."

By tradition, the event is held the day before Commencement on Cannon Green behind Nassau Hall. According to the University Archives, a formal Class Day was held as early as 1856, and in 1898 it was described as "a day over which the Graduating Class has full charge and which we run to suit ourselves, in our characteristic way."

While the president of the University presides over Commencement and typically gives the Commencement address, the graduating class selects its speaker for Class Day. The speaker is selected by the Class Day co-chairs in consultation with the elected class officers. Until the recent past, speakers were administrators, members of the faculty, prominent alumni and others with a Princeton connection (such as a Princeton parent). This trend started to change in 2001, when the senior class made history by selecting actor and comedian Bill Cosby, who had no affiliation with the University.

The selection of speakers has evolved to include prominent individuals who have something to offer that the class wants to hear. While the goal at times is to be entertained, the class also chooses speakers based on an interest in an individual's distinct point of view about current issues.

Seniors wear class jackets they receive as part of their transition to becoming alumni.
