Gang enslaves disabled Romanians as street beggars

Derek Delos, 29, an American businessman, said: “You can’t help but be somewhat shocked by what you are seeing when you arrive. It’s just something you don’t see day to day. We have the money and now we have the technology to do this. We can do much better.”

In a neat 10-acre deal and a minute from the German embassies in the West End, he has set up the Delos Centre, which he says will be open within a year to help “incredible, untapped human potential.”

Delos, a New York design entrepreneur who is always on the lookout for something new, met Chinese real estate magnate Cai Mingliang 18 months ago in Las Vegas and they started discussing how they could turn a small £5million building into a state-of-the-art centre.

The centre will focus on four areas: mental health, education, sport and the arts. The mental health sector will be based around an inpatient hospital that will be open to those with a range of conditions, from depression and anxiety to schizophrenia and autism.

The education side will focus on children with special needs and will feature a state-of-the-art school, to be built in the area of east London where Delos’s foundation was set up, to help start this initiative.

“I am currently at Oxford University and I get satisfaction from knowing that we are helping people,” he said. “We are doing something positive and we are making a difference.”

The centre is expected to open in time for the London Olympics in 2012 and to be fully operational by 2013.

Parents get help to weed out bad private tutors

Wellness home gives you vitamin shower

She’s 25, her hair is long and she’s satisfied with her life at the moment. She has found a partner she loves, and she doesn’t worry about finding another. She is happy with her job and her friends, and she has enough money to do what she wants. She has a sense of freedom and a sense of independence. She is living a fulfilling life.

Gangs enslaves disabled Romanians as street beggars

TRAVELLERS have found a new source of modern-day slavery, by selling disabled Romanians to British and French brothels.

In one case, a 10-year-old deaf and mute boy was sold to a brothel in Paris for £150,000.

In another, a 29-year-old woman with special needs was sold to a brothel in London for £250,000.

In the West End, Delos met his Chinese partner Cai Mingliang and they discussed how they could turn a small £5 million building into a state-of-the-art centre.

The centre will focus on four areas: mental health, education, sport and the arts. The mental health sector will be based around an inpatient hospital that will be open to those with a range of conditions, from depression and anxiety to schizophrenia and autism.

The education side will focus on children with special needs and will feature a state-of-the-art school, to be built in the area of east London where Delos’s foundation was set up, to help start this initiative.

“I am currently at Oxford University and I get satisfaction from knowing that we are helping people,” he said. “We are doing something positive and we are making a difference.”

The centre is expected to open in time for the London Olympics in 2012 and to be fully operational by 2013.