Question of the Week:

Am I Cut Out to be a Doctor?

Question: I think I may be earning a very poor grade this semester in biochemistry, perhaps a C–. Should I consider dropping being premed?

Answer: It is very disappointing to think that you may be struggling in biochemistry, but it is not the end of the world. The reality is that being premed is not the only route to becoming a doctor. If biochemistry is not your strong suit, there are other ways to improve your skills and understanding of the subject. It is important to remember that being premed does not necessarily mean that it’s the best career path for you based on your values, interests, and skills.

As far as dropping premed goes, it is certainly a question worth pondering. However, dropping premed would not mean that you would not be able to pursue a career in medicine. There are other ways to gain admission to medical school, such as taking additional classes or gaining experience in related fields. It is important to reflect on what you would have needed to change in order to find more success in biochemistry. This could include changing the way you study, seeking help from a tutor, or even re-taking the class.

The most important thing is to not let one rough semester dissuade you! As far as dropping premed or sticking with it, it’s certainly a question worth pondering over the summer. You can take a break from school and focus on personal or academic goals that might help you improve your performance in biochemistry.
